

Honda Motor (7267 JP)

FUNDAMENTAL VIEW ¹

As of 04 Mar 2024

- Honda continues to post impressive growth in its Automobile segment wholesale volumes and profitability following the normalization of its supply chain. Management expects to lean into the increasing demand for hybrid vehicles by introducing a Civic hybrid this year that it expects to account for about 40% of the models' sales in the U.S. It is also introducing its first high volume electric vehicles in 2024 under the Honda and Acura brands, along with a fuel cell electric vehicle (FCEV). Like Toyota, Honda's electrification strategy has been focused primarily on hybrid vehicles, although its introduction of electric and FCEVs is timely even if it lags most competitors.

RISKS & CATALYSTS

As of 04 Mar 2024

- Management maintained its FY24 wholesale volume guidance but raised its revenue and operating profit guidance. Consolidated revenue is now expected to increase +19% compared to its previous expectation for +18% growth despite modestly lower expectations for automobile and motorcycle unit sales. Management raised its consolidated operating profit guidance by 4% based on favorable pricing and currency effects offsetting higher warranty expense and unfavorable mix. The company's FY24 forecast now envisions a 160 bp operating margin expansion from 4.6% in FY23 to 6.2%, up from its previous expectation of a 140 bp YoY margin expansion.
- On January 18, 2024, American Honda management unveiled its expectations for its calendar year 2024 sales. After posting 33% growth in unit sales in 2023, American Honda is targeting unit sales growth of 10%-15% in 2024. The volume growth is projected to include an increase in hybrid volume, including the Honda Civic hybrid that will comprise about 40% of the models' sales when it launches this summer.
