

T-Mobile US (TMUS US)

FUNDAMENTAL VIEW ¹

As of 18 Mar 2025

- We expect T-Mobile will maintain its position as the industry leader in postpaid phone net additions, service revenue and EBITDA growth in 2025. We think the company has significant subscriber runway remaining in the suburban/rural and enterprise markets.
- Adjusted net leverage (2.4x at 4Q24) is 0.3x/0.5x lower than AT&T/Verizon. Relatively strong EBITDA growth and a modest dividend commitment results in greater financial flexibility than peers.
- T-Mobile benefits from the strongest spectrum position in the industry, including an average of 181 MHz in the 2.5 GHz band, which results in better 5G network coverage than AT&T and Verizon.

RISKS & CATALYSTS

- Converged wireless/broadband offers from cable operators raises the risk of pricing pressure in the mature consumer wireless market.
- The company has not shied away from acquisitions. T-Mobile recently acquired Mint Mobile and announced deals for US Cellular and two FTTH JVs (Lumos and MetroNet). So far, M&A has not had much impact on T-Mobile's credit metrics, but further moves into FTTH may be received poorly by investors.
- With T-Mobile's credit rating now comfortably in the mid-BBB area and leverage in the vicinity of the group's mid-2x target area, we expect the company's capital allocation to shift toward shareholder returns.
